If we could solve your dust and fume problem in minutes...

AirBench downdraught benches are self-contained workbenches with built-in dust and fume extraction systems. Utilizing down draught technology, they align with COSHH Regulations by pulling contaminants downward, away from the operator's breathing zone. In New Zealand, WorkSafe guidelines emphasize reducing exposure to harmful dust, and downdraught benches help achieve compliance by effectively capturing pollutants.

Traditional extraction systems often lack financial and operational efficiency, failing due to poor criteria or reluctance to change production methods. Their effectiveness remains uncertain until commissioning, risking costly investments. Many systems require frequent adjustments, hindering productivity. Flexible arm solutions, for instance, lose effectiveness over time. In contrast, downdraught benches directly address usability concerns, capturing pollutants efficiently without constant modification.

These benches allow easy velocity adjustments to match tasks, extending filter life and lowering operating costs. They can replace existing workbenches without altering seating arrangements. AirBench models activate instantly, require no adjustments, and resist minor sabotage, performing well even in welding applications where high vacuum solutions may be impractical. For larger extraction needs, Vertex models are modular and can be scaled as needed.

In over 90% of cases, down draught technology is the superior choice, combining economic viability with reliable pollutant control. By supplementing gravity without compromising investment, it ensures compliance with New Zealand's health and safety regulations, safeguarding workers' well-being.

For further details on safety, visit WorkSafe www.worksafe.govt.nz or ask your local TradeZone Team member about AirBench.
